Q: Recording a drum recording from a single drum I would like to record a drum recording from one drum instead of multiple cymbals and snare drum. This is for dance performance so I need the tones to be very clear. I'm looking at the option of getting a lathe and recording the sound on a single drum. Is this the right approach? Any advice will be appreciated. Thanks!

A: Recordings made on a lathe are commonly referred to as "acoustic cymbal sounds" because (1) they sound exceptionally good and (2) they are relatively easy to record. Some lathes can even record other instruments like a bass drum. Here is an example of the sound from an Yamaha TL808 Retro-tonewheel drum machine drum. You can record a cowbell by scratching the back of one of the heads. Not exactly what you need but a very similar result. Note: the recording was not made on a lathe, I edited the clip in Pinnacle Studio. If you are looking to record more than one drum head that the machine is capable of recording, some lathes and other recording equipment can be adapted to record drums. This answer is based on the equipment I own. The bottom is a Yamaha MR-09, it's a modified recording lathe that can record 7 out of 16 drum heads. The top is a R8 (2) and a TR8 (4), a recording drum machine. These are three separate recording units that have their own drumhead selection. The microphone on my R8 is an A-D converter that strips the analog signal from a Line-6 Pod. I just did some trimming and posted the waveform. After being presented with the OpenMandriva 2011 1.10 preview release, After years of being on Mandriva Linux (1994 was the year that you will connect to a text-mode Mandriva Linux live distribution using network), after the last news in February 2008, which included some new interface design and additional Linux Compilers and libraries, after the last update of 2009 with the 1.3 version of DwarfHeimdal released, we see the release of a new version of Mandriva Linux looking very promising.
